THE TEXAS NORMAL.

A FEW WORDS CONCERNING DENTON'S COLLEGES.

[illegible] Institute and History of College—The Present: Faculty and Management—Some Facts Concerning the Schools.

The building is one of the first to attract attention of visitors to Denton, situated at the end of West Hickory street, on an eminence, and easy of access from the Public Square. A very noticeable feature about the location is that it is high and dry, with the accompaniments of quietude and plenty of shade. The building is a two story brick with basement, and is trimmed with red stone. It is of modern Romanesque style, is constructed on the most improved plans and covers nearly 6,000 square feet of ground. A majestic belfry tower rises 70 feet over the main entrance which is a massive archway of Trenton stone, done in rough cut. The roof is slate, with ridge-roll at the top by cupped down ironwork with other features to render the exterior one of beauty and symmetry. In the building are large and ventilating rooms, thereby lighted, airy, college office, halls etc. a description of which follows:

The main entrance is on the east, near the northeast corner. A broad hall runs [illegible] to the other near the center of the building, running north and south, at each end of which there are large doors opening to the exterior.

On this floor are three large rooms to the one used for a chapel, and connected by the preparatory department on the west side. Each of these rooms is an elegant room, capable of seating from 400 people. The floor of this room is slightly inclined toward the rostrum, which is in the center part of the room. This is elevated. The hall is handsomely furnished, with opera chairs, [illegible] lounges and piano, and is [illegible] for social use.

The [illegible] department occupies a room to the east of the chapel hall. This room is furnished with large tables, desks, [illegible] and is the assembly room of the literary societies held by pupils.

The preparatory department occupies a room to the west of the hall on the north part of this floor. The furniture consists of desks made [illegible] north and south.

A stairway rises from each end of the large hallway on the first floor to a corresponding hallway above, running entirely to the head of the stairway according from the north end of the hall is the president's office and college library. This is one of the neatest appearing in the whole building. It is a double room separated by a large archway, and is handsomely furnished. Framed [illegible] of the different colleges and universities of the United States occupy the walls. The library contains a good supplement, and a splendid collection of choice works on literature in the English and American schools. Many valuable and standard works of reference.

The hall on this floor runs north and south, with another extending to the east. North of this hall on the [illegible] room devoted to work in the [illegible] Science. The ordinary [illegible] runs this room contains the college apparatus, including the electric machine for [illegible] and condenser, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
